Measuring the Interaction of Mutants with Proteins of Interleukin 1B. The interaction of a biological macromolecule with another biological macromolecule is a common key step for its function. A comprehensive map of the interaction networks may help us to understand the regulatory mechanisms of biological systems. In this study, we tested the ability of a series of mutant proteins of interleukin 1 $\beta$  (IL-1 $\beta$ ) to interact with a series of proteins of the IL-1 receptor family. Such an interaction map will provide us with a detailed map of the interaction network of IL-1 $\beta$  and its receptor family, providing a reference for further study of the regulation mechanisms of IL-1 $\beta$ . We used a yeast two-hybrid screening method, combined with the measurement of relative fluorescence unit (RFU) and enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay (ELISA), to test the interaction ability of IL-1 $\beta$  mutants with its receptor-binding protein, as well as its receptor, the IL-1 receptor, and the accessory protein. We successfully obtained a reference map of the interaction network of IL-1 $\beta$  and its receptor family, which provided us with a comprehensive understanding of the function of IL-1 $\beta$ .

(a) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an image display device and more particularly to a liquid crystal display (LCD) device. (b) Description of Related Art In general, an LCD device has a structure in which a liquid crystal layer is sandwiched between two substrates. A plurality of electrodes is disposed on one of the two substrates. The electrodes on the two substrates are formed such that the electrodes on one of the two substrates are arranged in opposition to the electrodes on the other substrate. When a voltage is applied to the electrodes to form electric fields between the electrodes, the liquid crystal molecules of the liquid crystal layer are arranged to be parallel to the electric field. Thus, the light transmittance of the liquid crystal layer is
