01. Field of the Invention This invention relates to an apparatus and method for measuring air flow during the operation of heating, ventilating and air conditioning (HVAC) equipment. 2.

Discussion of the Related Art The operation of heating, ventilating and air conditioning equipment is governed by a set of physical and economic parameters. For example, the equipment is usually designed to function at a certain temperature, and is usually operated at less than full capacity if operating at a desired temperature may result in excessive energy consumption. On the other hand, operating the equipment at full capacity with an ambient temperature of 90.degree. F. in a hot summer day results in a substantial loss of energy because the air flowing through the equipment will not be sufficiently heated to an environment comfort level. To reduce the energy cost, equipment designers are usually given specifications that relate the difference in energy cost (e.g., dollars per square foot of area) to the desired range of air temperatures within the space of the equipment. To implement these specifications in a manufacturing plant, production engineers usually design equipment for different modes of operation having the desired characteristics. A typical mode of operation is a normal mode of operation in which the equipment operates at the designed capacity and air temperature as determined by a designed air distribution pattern. In a particular space, the temperature is usually averaged over time and is usually dependent upon the amount of air entering the space and the amount of air leaving the space. For example, when the design air distribution pattern provides for a return air and supply air ratio of one to one, the average air temperature is usually related to the air flow rate and the area of the enclosed space. However, if the equipment is not operating in the designed mode, it is usually advantageous to measure the actual air flow rate and the actual temperature to adjust the equipment to the designed mode of operation. After the adjustment is made, it is usually desirable to measure the actual flow rate to
