Our Sister-Game Momo: A Big Sister Game About Little Babies By Geek & Sundry Our vision for the Momo: A Big Sister game was simple: make a game about what it's like to be that big sister, and get your little sister to play it. Our game offers a fantastic new way for a parent to play with their children. A lot of the work we did in developing the game, was spent talking with parents about what it is like to be the kind of big sister who sits next to a baby on the floor of the baby's room. We don't want to make a game about cruelty, or child abuse, or making "complicated" decisions. What we have been exploring is that big sister role is difficult, but also something that's very relatable. We want to get across to the players that big sisters often spend a large part of their days playing with babies, talking to them, or just sitting and watching them. We wanted to explore what that time is like in a different way. The game places you as the big sister and gives you a chance to show your kids what it's like to look after them when they're young, and to stay close to them as they grow up. It's a game that invites you to explore your relationship with your children, and to talk to your kids and get their opinion on a range of events as they happen. During the creation of the Momo game, the original pitch was mostly about how the big sister can play a very relatable role. A realistic big sister, a realistic family, a relationship between the kids and the big sister. But it was when we started building the game that we started thinking “hmm, wouldn’t it be great if the game was about a special and unique relationship, one that hadn’t been explored in a game before?” I think the moment of realization came to us as we were talking to parents and children at our “Pick-A-Genre” panel. One of the children, a boy, said that there was one genre that his big sister seemed to play more than any other. He said that his sister sat on his bed, looking at him and laughing. That’s something that we’d never thought about before, and the moment we saw it we thought “that While Border Patrol agents are currently stationed in rural areas of Honduras, it may be that the agency is preparing to move into cities and other urban areas, beginning next fiscal year. “Starting in the next 12-month period, we’re hoping to be activating a team on a routine basis,” said Roger Maier, Tucson Sector spokesperson for U.S. Customs and Border Patrol. Maier pointed out that the number of agents sent to Raul Doe trails the number of boots that have been deployed to occupied territory, in particular the dangerous border region with Mexico. Mariana Treviño, Raul Doe’s attorney, said there were only four teams operating at the time of Raul Doe’s arrest, but that in subsequent months the number had grown to between eight and 12
