In this book, Cyrus Lakdawala examines the Caro-Kann.Q: Create array of struct pointers I would like to create an array of struct pointers to pass it as an argument to a function where I don't know how many structs will be in the array. Is this possible? I'll do some more clarifications. I have this struct in my code: typedef struct { char first_name[FIELD_SIZE]; char last_name[FIELD_SIZE]; int dob; int year; } person; and this is a function: bool create_person(person ** pptrs){ *pptrs=malloc(sizeof(person)); //We need to copy some struct values and string into the person struct. //In this case I've skipped the code to copy the fields because it's //something like strcpy(pptrs->first_name, "XXX", FIELD_SIZE) etc., return true; } and this is a main function: int main() { int i; //I will call create_person 4 times, *so it's important that I allocate an array of person pointers*/ person ** p_ptr=(person **)
