A series of cDNA clones of the oncogenic strain of measles virus was constructed by inserting the appropriate restriction fragments in the unique region of the pH RNA genome. Clones containing both 5'-terminal, and internal sequences could be obtained. These clones were used for RNA synthesis in the presence of nuclear extracts of a human cell line (HeLa) and of HeLa cells infected with herpes simplex virus, to demonstrate that cDNA synthesis can occur in these complex systems. The sequences of several clones of the NP promoter and of the P protein coding region were determined. The P gene appears to be a unique gene; at least three different P translation initiation sites were identified. Experiments designed to test for the presence of a cis-acting viral promoter within the gene for the P protein were unsuccessful. The analysis of the nucleotide sequence of NP promoter cDNA clones revealed several interesting features including a conserved termination sequence which may play a role in the termination/reinitiation of P transcription in vivo. got some outdoor time Results of patient exam ![(jls0201637450008.jpg) Swelling was still present. On the day of the patient's planned discharge the swelling increased dramatically, and lymph drainage had increased in size. The patient was readmitted, a repeat MRI was performed, and the repeat MRI showed a very similar appearance to the original MRI performed upon referral. The swelling is shown as in [Fig.
