At a London Exhibition in which large sections of a peculiar fossil skeleton were displayed, a shipload of Egyptian antiquities mysteriously disappeared. This is quite a large event in the history of both Egyptology and paleontology. The most notable item on the missing list was the mummy of a very large-headed man who is believed to have been the Pharaoh Ramesses II. The report came out of the Royal Anthropological Institute of Great Britain. The proceedings of the Fourth International Congress of Archaeology, which were published in its entirety the next year, left no doubt as to what had happened. The author of the report, Professor John Garstang of the British Museum, stated that the bones of the mummy were put on display at the British Museum in April. The exhibit was greatly popular and there was a great demand for tickets. It was a mammoth task to transport the enormous mummy case from the Cairo Museum to London by boat. At the appointed time the boat arrived at Plymouth. The Queen of England had given one of her own boats to be used for this occasion. The mummy was placed on board and the boat set out. The next day there was a slight delay. The weather was bad. The boat had been taken to the coast for a landing which had to be made in the dark. The Egyptians were frightened that their precious cargo would be lost. It arrived safely at Plymouth in the early morning of the sixth day, the scheduled time of departure. The mummy was duly covered with an antiseptic on the way to London, and was deposited for temporary storage in a container in the basement of the British Museum. Professor Garstang was told that the inventory, a list of the contents of the crate, was in the care of the British Museum. He could examine it at any time. Because of the lack of space the entire museum was crowded. Professor Garstang was aware of the attention which was being drawn to the exhibits in the basement, but he thought it was his duty to examine the inventory. It was there! A list of the contents of the crate was carefully arranged on the table in front of him. He began to read. It was quite unbelievable. The name on the crate had no doubt been changed, but it was just the same as that on the title page of the mummy. The mummy
